

ent tones on behind or below the stage. The first tableau represents a salon of a Parisienne receiving other artists at a block of afternoon reception. The fair women (in wood) are all attired in handsome gowns and move about with consummate grace. They will be chased and teased from day to day and will deal with topics which can be treated in the lighter vein. The scandals of the boulevards, rumors from the theatre, the gossip of the day and pictures will all be mentioned. The way will be very free in their criticisms, and as the marionettes cannot well be sued for slander, aggrieved parties will have difficulty in getting satisfaction.
